Why Teach and Study German in Public Schools?*

Because of the ever increasing importance of a knowledge of modern foreign languages.

Because the study of a foreign language leads to a better understanding of our own native tongue, English.

Because the acquisition of a foreign language is in later life a difficult undertaking; while in childhood, when the vocal organs are most flexible and the memory most retentive, languages can be learned with comparative ease.

Because the study of German in no way hinders a child's progress in other subjects.

Because all colleges require, before graduation, a knowledge of at least one modern foreign language, German being required for pursuing certain courses.

Because a knowledge of German is the key to an important literature and an indispensable wealth of scientific information.

Because next to English, German is the most widely spoken language in the world.

Because European nations are continuing to study each other's languages.

Because a knowledge of a second language does not hinder the development of patriotism or Americanism.
